If you're serious about improving your performance and helping people around you perform at a higher level, this workshop was built for you.

A growing number of cops today are interested in optimizing their performance. They understand that to perform at a high level, you have to train for it. But while you're working hard to optimize your body, are you putting the same level of attention into optimizing your leadership and performance on the job?

Leadership in law enforcement is not limited to rank. Yes, chiefs lead organizations and sergeants lead patrol teams, but leadership happens at every level of the profession. And leadership is performance. It is the ability to think clearly under pressure, influence others, and make good decisions when the stakes are high. Yet most law enforcement leadership training does little to develop those abilities. Too often it consists of generic advice that sounds good in the classroom but rarely translates into better performance on the street.

Meanwhile, other high-performing professions take leadership development much more seriously. Professional athletes work with performance coaches. Elite military units invest heavily in developing leaders at every level of their organization. High-performing teams train constantly on how to optimize both individual and team performance.

Law enforcement officers are expected to perform at the same elite level. But they rarely receive the same kind of coaching. That is why we are bringing a different kind of leadership training to the law enforcement profession. This one-day workshop introduces law enforcement professionals to performance principles used by elite military units to build resilient leaders and high performing teams.

Workshop topics include:

Leading yourself before leading others

Performance principles used by elite military units

Building trust and cohesion within high performing teams

Simple leadership frameworks that improve communication and accountability

Strategies for maintaining performance under stress

Wellness and recovery practices that actually work in demanding professions
